Dear Hiring Manager:

I'm a computer science student at the University of Victoria specializing in networking and communications, and I'd love to explore my specialization by spending 8 months as one of your talented frontend developers. I'm beyond thrilled for the opportunity to join the impact.com family, and contribute to your obsession with customer success.

Beyond being an opportunity for learning, the front end developer position is a way for me to apply my problem solving skills to meaningful, innovative projects. Two years ago, I took the initiative to develop and host a portfolio website completely from scratch on my own, in less than two weeks. The following summer, I furthered my web-education at ValidMind through hands-on experience with static site generation and working with Git.

Later during my previous internship at ValidMind, I was tasked with creating a striking banner template for Eventbrite webinars. By designing it in PowerPoint, I ensured my template could be used by team members unfamiliar with traditional image editing software.

Returning to school after the end of my internship, I collaborated with a team of students to create and pitch a prototype overhaul of UVic's club management system. Our prototype, designed in Figma, emphasized accessibility for new students by increasing readability and incorporating design language from the UVic Student Society Website.

Lastly, I read the entire job advertisement and put together a personalized website as part of my application—I really do want the job! The site is live on my GitHub, showcasing my design projects. However, I must apologize; the site isn't yet complete due to time conflicts with my standing academic commitments.

I hope you'll agree that I'm a match for your frontend developer position, and I look forward to hearing from you soon.

Sincerely,
Parris Mook-Sang-Forbes
